FAO-EC regional conference on rural development and agricultural and food quality linked to geographical origin in Asia: Lessons and perspectives

Rainbow Room, Imperial Queen's Park Hotel Bangkok

Date: Thursday 11th June 2009

Time: 09.00 - 17.00 hrs.

Background

Some agricultural and food products are distinguished from one another by certain characteristics qualities or reputations resulting essentially from their geographical origin. This differentiation can be attributed to the unique local features of the product, its history or its distinctive character linked to natural or human factors such as soil, climate, local know how and traditions. Generally, these characteristics are already recognized to some extent by consumers at local, national or even international level

Asian countries all demonstrate a food culture which has been elaborated over time with agriculture and food systems developing alongside human civilization in the various agro-ecological zones of the region. As such, the concept of food quality linked to its origin is very natural to most Asian consumers. Many Asian agricultural products have even developed an international reputation for quality linked to their origin.

These products of origin-linked quality can increase food security, inasmuch as they contribute to rural development and the preservation of food diversity, while also offering consumers a wider choice. Through the link between such products and their origin, they can help to preserve natural resources, maintain traditions, strengthen the organization of local stakeholders and prevent delocalization and rural exodus.

Thanks to their recognized reputation, these products of origin-linked quality can also be the focus of local and international marketing chains, the actors of which try to benefit from the added value intrinsically contained in the product itself.

As for other types of specific quality, such as those connected with organic farming or fair trade consumers must be able to recognize the specific nature of the product through information, designation or labeling.

Objectives of the seminar:

The joint regional conference between FAO and The Delegation of the European Commission to Thailand and Department of Intellectual Property of Thailand designed to share information on the current status of rural development and agriculture and food quality linked to geographical origin in Asia as the countries in the region have chosen different institutional options to manage this specific quality scheme. The regional conference will also discuss best practices for the Asian region in their implementation at national and local levels
